My father says March 1st is "Liberation Day." For him, it's when the days start to get long enough in Portland that winter's dreariness promises to fade away. In Colorado, it marks a shift toward shoulder season. In Arizona, the sun's kiss promises the desert its beloved, deep warmth is returning. My friends in Washington say this is when the mountains start to glow again. Closer to home, in Carpinteria, California, it marks the passing of our last average frost date, and the time to start planting again.

What have you planted this year that you want to nurture? What has come up that you need to continue to leave behind? Progress is messy, unknown, and ever continuous. You are most likely doing better than you think – that small "m" of the mind top dancing doubt through the dark recesses of each step forward; that capital "M" knowing its intrinsic way.

You most likely are ready for what's next: spring's promise of future blossoms as the rains pour around, clouds part, and the sun's warmth comes again to streak across the sky. You may feel like it's all going swimmingly, better than you ever imagined, and I applaud that recognition of joy, strength, and progress. The fact remains that this next month is the one that will turn the tide.

You deserve happiness. You deserve joy. You deserve progress and all its murky mix of ability, grace, funk, and collaboration. You deserve it all, friends, in March and evermore. So as the clocks tick forward, and we scoot our way into this next phase of our adventure, I will remind you of the freedom to choose, to be, to share, and to create. This world is yours, so go get it. 🌻
